The Fukushima nuclear disaster sent shock waves around the world. Many residents were forced to evacuate. A substantial number of them are still unable to return, and not a few have already died.

At the opening session of the criminal trial, held on June 30, 2017, the attorneys appointed by the court to serve as prosecutors submitted a substantial body of evidence indicating that even though Tokyo Electric Power Co., Inc. (TEPCO) had foreseen the possibility of a large-scale tsunami and considered countermeasures, they decided to postpone their implementation.

The defendants insist that (a) the tsunami could not have been foreseen and (b) even if had been predicted, there was not enough time to implement countermeasures and therefore, they are not liable. The prosecutors insist that the defendants should have shut down the nuclear power plant until all countermeasures were complete and safety secured.

They assert that it is a crime to operate a nuclear power plant where safety has not been secured.

The March 2011 nuclear disaster at the Fukushima nuclear power plant of Tokyo Electric Power Company, which has been ranked at the highest (meaning “most serious”) level according to the International Nuclear Event Scale, dispersed a massive amount of radioactivity into the natural environment and robbed people of their everyday lives. No resolution is in sight, and the problems confronting people are only growing more serious. Not only Japan, but the world is watching this trial, hoping to see the truth of the disaster disclosed and responsibility made clear.

At the opening session of the trial on June 30, 2017, the three defendants pleaded “not guilty.” The court-appointed attorneys serving as prosecutors submitted numerous pieces of evidence demonstrating the criminal liability of the defendants. We were led to the renewed recognition that the truth of the disaster had been hidden from us. Is Japan a country abiding by the rule of law? Is it a country that respects the value of all life? This what is at stake in this trial. We strongly urge the court to conduct an appropriate and speedy trial, leading to a fair decision.
